Issues of legality aside, the Internet has long been the main source of music for many of us who live in this modern society. Provided that you know where and what to find, you can get almost any digital song available on the planet. But downloading is not the same as enjoying and organizing. You still have to manually add downloaded songs to your chosen music player app, and maybe organize them the way you want. If you use iTunes to manage your music collection, you can automate organizational steps and give yourself more time to enjoy the music. At the beginning of There's Folder The main actor for this automation system is an iTunes feature called Automatically Add to iTunes. It's actually a folder located deep inside iTunes music folders. This feature will automatically import supported files inside the folder to the iTunes library. Simply manually drag and drop the downloaded files into this folder. You can make things a little easier by placing a folder shortcut in Finder's Mac sidebar. However, knowing the existence of this folder opens up a new possibility - we can customize the system so that the downloaded files will end up in this folder. Loaded with torrents Let's start with torrent files. If you use Transmission to download torrents, like most Mac users, you can use its built-in grouping function to automate the process. Open your preferences by visiting the Transfer - Preferences menu or use the team and comma label. Select the Group tab, select one of the groups available and rename it. Or you can also create a new group by clicking on the Plus button below. Then check the Custom Location box, and then find and select the folder Automatically add to iTunes as a user's location. You'll save a few steps if you've already placed a label in the sidebar. Then check the field to assign a group of new translations based on criteria and start building filtering rules. Since we're going to filter out music from the rest of the torrents, you want to add general extensions of music as rules. Expressions: Any file - ends - musical extensions work great for me. You can go a little further and turn on the Auto add feature under the Transfers feature - Add in the Preference box and choose to see the folder where you put the downloaded torrent file. With this system, all you have to do is just click on the torrent file to download the link that you find on the web page and downloaded songs appear on iTunes. Downloaded from other sources, you can set similar arrangements for songs you download from sources other than torrent networks, such as direct downloads from your friend's public folder. Your download manager supports filtering, which allows you to keep a certain kind of file in a certain place, then you're good to go. But if there is such a thing in the list of functions of the download manager, you will need help from the file management system, like Folder Action in the machine, Hazel (not free) or SmartShuno Broken URL removed. We've discussed a few use of Folder Action before. So why don't we try SmartShuno in this discussion? Our goal is to create a system that will move all the music you downloaded to the folder Automatically add to iTunes. The first step is opening SmartShuno and starting to create a rule by clicking on the Add button. Then describe all the requirements you need, including file extension, target folder, and actions. Click The Good button to start using the rule. If you get everything right, you'll have all the downloaded music files collected inside the folder. Once iTunes is opened, they will be automatically imported. Unsupported files that have been uploaded along with the songs will be placed in the Not Added folder. Do you use iTunes to manage your songs? Do you know of any other way to automate the process of organizing a song?
